

Reflection

I believe that a picture can be more effective than a thousand words and for that reason, I have implemented a lot of visuals in my lesson plans. I have spent a considerable amount of time selecting appropriate pictures, being sensitive to students' emotions. The concept of human rights covers a very wide area. I have designed these lesson plans to introduce the topic and nurture students' curiosity.

One of the biggest challenge I have faced in designing these lesson plans was to find meaningful activities, relevant to students' life. It was interesting to link my teaching subject (French) with Human Rights as it provides students with extensive new vocabulary that can be used in the future.

Global education has the power to give students the tools to demonstrate international consciousness. It is adopting world citizenship as a value. It is a great way for them to explore new horizons and deepen their global knowledge. Growing up global is a life-long process not a final destination. I believe that as teachers, we must encourage and facilitate flexible and cooperative thinking. Overall, it was a developmental experience as it helped me to rethink my role as a teacher. I am looking forward to teach these lessons and to implement more in the future.
